Description

Longtemps ignoré des égyptologues, le rivage de la mer Rouge a livré depuis une dizaine d'années une quantité appréciable d'informations qui permettent maintenant de se faire une idée des modalités de son utilisation à l'époque pharaonique. Le site portuaire de Mersa Gawasis, découvert en 1977 par l'archéologue égyptien Abd el - Moneim Sayed, a ainsi fait l'objet d'une reprise d'étude à partir de 2001. De nouvelles fouilles, effectuées par une équipe italo - américaine, ont permis de démontrer sans appel - notamment grâce à la mise au jour d'un abondant matériel archéologique et épigraphique - l'utilisation de cette station comme point de départ pour des expéditions lancées en direction du pays de Pount, aux confins méridionaux de la mer Rouge, pendant l'ensemble de la XIIe dynastie. Dans le même temps, la fouille du site d'Ayn Soukhna, découvert en 1999 par Mahmoud Abd el - Raziq au nord du golfe de Suez, a livré progressivement les vestiges d'un point d'embarquement aménagé dès le début de (Ancien Empire pour se rendre par voie , maritime aux mines de cuivre et de turquoise du Sinaï. Les vestiges d'embarcations complètes du Moyen Empire y ont été découverts, entreposés dans des galeries magasins aménagées sur le site. L'objectif de ce colloque, qui s'est tenu au Caire et à Ayn Soukhna en janvier 2009, a été de réunir la plupart des spécialistes engagés dans des travaux de recherche sur la côte de la mer Rouge, et sur les pistes mettant cette zone en relation avec la vallée du Nil. Les Actes réunis ici permettent de faire un point d'étape sur les connaissances récemment acquises dans ce domaine nouveau de l'archéologie égyptienne.
